stress lower the performance, occupational stressors contribute to organizational inefficiency, high staff turnover, absenteeism due to sickness, decreased quality and quantity of practice, increased costs of health care, and decreased job satisfaction. One of the organizational outcomes affected by occupational stress is job performance; excessive levels of occupational stress cause fatigue, anxiety, depression, and social withdrawal, disengaging employees from work.

Employee engagement is the individual's involvement and satisfaction with their work, as well as enthusiasm for work. Engagement occurs when individuals are emotionally connected to others and cognitively vigilant. This study deals with gaps in current literature by signifying the effects of occupational injuries on employees' turnover intention in the manufacturing sector in Pakistan, with an immense involvement of safety culture in an employee's professional life. One distinctive feature is that the research is conducted in the Pakistani context because stress results in a high percentage of absence and loss of employment. The ratio of stress-affected individuals in the organization is increasing at an alarming rate that affects both employee performance and goal achievement. Even in 2002, stress has many definitions; it is a part of both social and concrete sciences. This paper investigates the impact of job-related stress on job satisfaction of nursing staff working in hospitals. Job stress is one of the most important workplace health risks for employees, and job satisfaction has been considered as a crucial factor in the provision of high-quality services and superior performance at hospitals.
